Uniting from below

A History of Grassroots Labour and Social Movements
Alberta Labour History Institute 2014 Calendar

The theme of our 2014 labour history calendar is “Uniting From Below: Labour and Social Movements.” The calendar is an attempt to highlight and honour the partnership and solidarity between labour and social movements. While this survey is certainly incomplete, its intention is to recognize the important work of generations of rank-and-file unionists and activists from various social movements. The calendar describes the institutional and political support the formal labour movement has provided to struggles such as the fight for Medicare and LGBTQ rights. But perhaps more importantly we are compelled to highlight and remember the informal person to person connections between union and social justice activists in such struggles as anti-apartheid and Latin American solidarity movements. The cross-pollination between labour and social justice movements has had far reaching impacts during the last several decades.

These relationships have helped inform the current labour movement in its attempt to develop broader, more inclusive community organizing strategies, and has helped show the potential and power of social unionism. The labour movement would do well to remember these struggles which have helped them extend their influence and have also helped make them a much more relevant and representative movement.

Before the 21st century, Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgendered (LGBT) workers had reason to complain that the labour movement was hesitant to work with LGBT social movements. But, owing to the pressures of LGBT persons within the labour movement, that has changed over the last decade. In 2003, the Alberta Federation of Labour convention created a working group to deal with issues of importance to lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered workers. The next convention in 2005 transformed that working group into a permanent Standing Committee, the Pride and Solidarity Committee. Pride and Solidarity works to establish and implement LGBT programs in the workplace, home, and community and to promote labour’s values and struggles among LGBT persons via forums, conferences, mass action, and educational courses. The Committee’s work has resulted, among other things, in the production of posters that chronicle the struggle of LGBT activists in Alberta.

In 2008, both the AFL and the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees were sponsors of Pride Week in Edmonton and have continued to support Pride events across the province. LGBT resolutions passed at the 2011 AFL convention demonstrate some of LGBT workers’ current struggles. They included a call for making “gender identity and gender expression” areas to be included in anti-bullying policies in schools, which school boards are increasingly agreeing to do. The convention also called for education about sexual diversity in schools and for an end to discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation for programs of blood and organ donation.

Aboriginal Struggles

The trade union movement in Alberta played an important role in the 1960s in the struggle for legislation to prohibit employers and landlords from discriminating against Albertans on the basis of their racial origins. But Canada’s first peoples remain the victims not only of discrimination but of colonial refusals to recognize their rights as the first occupants of Alberta. The trade union movement has supported struggles for Aboriginal social justice such as the seven-decades struggle of the Lubicon Lake Cree for control over their territory, which is increasingly being ravaged by giant oil companies.

In 1997, for the first time, the AFL reserved two positions on its executive council for Aboriginal representatives. Barb Ames, one of the first two representatives, promised: “We will be reaching out to the aboriginal community in an effort to find out how unions and aboriginal people can work together to promote justice and provide opportunity for aboriginals in the workplace.”

The AFL lobbied federal and provincial governments to proclaim a national holiday on June 21, National Aboriginal Solidarity Day, so that Canadians might focus on the history, culture, and struggles of Aboriginal peoples.

The Workers of Colour and Aboriginal Workers Committee, founded in the late 1990s, fights racism both in the workplace and the broader community. The labour movement has been a firm supporter of the grassroots Idle No More movement that arose in December 2012 to use activism to prod governments to fulfill their commitments to Native people.

Dutch and British colonialism in southern Africa dispossessed the Native peoples of the region. In 1948, South Africa elected a National Party government that was committed to hardline policies of residential and occupational segregation of the “races” in the country, subordinating non-whites to whites and depriving them of civil rights while subjecting them to extreme exploitation by white employers. These policies were called “apartheid.” The exploited masses of South Africa resisted apartheid, and the government cracked down on protesters, massacring 69 demonstrators in Sharpeville in 1960. The Sharpeville Massacre inspired a world-wide anti-apartheid movement that included civil rights advocates, including the trade union movement in Canada. Initially the trade unions however only supported a boycott of goods made in South Africa, balking at a policy of Canada divesting itself of South African capital because a number of unionized firms, such as Carling Brewery, were controlled by South African investors. In the 1980s, Alberta unions joined the Canadian Labour Congress in supporting the illegal unions that sprang up in South Africa to defend non-white workers from exploitation and to demand equal civil rights for all South Africans. Apartheid finally ended in the 1990s when an international campaign of economic sanctions against South Africa forced the National Party to concede civil rights for all South Africans.

In the 1960s and 1970s, the United Farmworkers of America fought to gain union recognition for grape pickers, mostly Mexican immigrants, who were battling exploitative employers. César Chávez, the union president, facing hostility both from the employers and California legislators, organized a boycott of California grapes across North America in a partially successful effort to force the orchard owners to negotiate wages and working conditions with the union. Among other issues, the workers demanded that the employers end their spraying of grape fields with insecticides and herbicides that were poisoning the farmworkers and their families. Alberta unions publicized the grape boycott among their members and the general public in Alberta. Unions also raised funds to provide financial support for striking farmworkers. CUPE representative Clarence Lacombe later noted:

When I was a representative in Red Deer, and also president of the Labour Council, we collected money for the California farm workers, and when César Chávez...came to Red Deer, I had the opportunity to talk to him. I consider him to be one of the brightest leaders in the labour movement, and somebody who’s an example to other people as to what can be accomplished when you have a strong enough desire to do something.

In 1985, the Progressive Conservative government of Brian Mulroney began negotiating a free-trade agreement with the American government. An agreement was announced in 1987, and its provisions included an end to tariff protection for Canadian industries and of most other forms of protection, as well as an end to most efforts to support Canadian ownership of companies in Canada.

Alberta unions had begun opposing talk of free trade as the negotiations took place, noting that Mulroney had pledged during the 1984 federal election that he would not pursue freer trade with the United States, a country against which Canada had dropped many of its earlier barriers to trade in the post-war period. AFL president Dave Werlin warned the organization’s convention in 1986 that free trade threatened “our Canadian resources, our Canadian jobs, our Canadian culture, our Canadian social services, our Canadian standard of living, and Canadian sovereignty.”

The Pro-Canada Network, a broad activist coalition, in which labour played a key role, organized opposition to the free-trade agreement. In the November, 1988 federal election, a majority of Canadians voted for parties that opposed the FTA. But the split of the anti-FTA vote delivered a majority of all seats to the PCs, who benefited from a multi-million-dollar corporate and media campaign in favour of the free-trade deal.

In the early years of the Cold War, the trade union movement was blindsided by government, media, and corporate efforts to brand as Communist subversion any opposition to American-led efforts to subordinate the Third World to Western economic interests. The trade union movement was therefore largely missing in action as anti-nuclear and anti-imperialist organizations attempted to sway Canadian public opinion away from a militaristic view of Canada’s possible role in international affairs.

But by the 1970s, as cracks in the Cold War coalition emerged, the labour movement began to view militarism and imperialism as doubtful friends of Canadian workers. The Alberta Federation of Labour organized Alberta workers to oppose the aggressive military build-up under President Ronald Reagan in the 1980s. In particular, it spoke out against Reagan’s plans to build a strategic shield around the United States, which would protect that country against possible nuclear attack while allowing the U.S. to strike out against other countries without having to fear retaliation. It called instead for joint disarmament among nuclear countries. The AFL also opposed Canada’s willingness to test the Americans’ Cruise missiles, missiles that could kill scores of people while leaving buildings standing.

Alberta’s trade unions were the major organizers of a march from Cold Lake to Edmonton in May, 1983, in which, for 13 days, workers and other peace activists marched from town to town, joined at each stop by members of local anti-Cruise committees who participated for the duration of the march.

The trade union movement has a long history of fighting for state provision for needy Canadians. Trade union campaigns played a big role in convincing governments to legislate minimum wages, workers’ compensation, old-age pensions, and unemployment insurance. The trade union movement has consistently fought for improvements to these programs, against which corporate groups continue to urge governments to limit both coverage and payments. The trade union movement, beginning in the 1940s, also worked in coalitions with veterans’ groups, social workers, and seniors’ organizations to campaign for a large-scale public presence in the housing market. This coalition argued that this was the only way to insure that lower-paid workers, the unemployed, and those unable to work were all housed decently. In the 1970s, the trade union movement added the struggle for public, geared-to-income daycare to its demands in recognition of the fact that women were more likely to be living in poverty than men. Since the 1970s labour has also worked with anti-poverty organizations controlled by poor people themselves, such as today’s Canada Without Poverty, formerly the National Anti-Poverty Organization. Labour calls for a guaranteed annual income above the poverty line for all Canadians. The labour movement has also called for a public homecare program and for a public system of homes for seniors and younger disabled people who require a level of care too high for homecare to fulfill.

In 1960, the AFL, making its annual presentation to the provincial government, called for human rights legislation to ban discrimination on the basis of “race, colour or creed.” In 1967, the theme of the AFL’s Canadian Centennial convention was “Human Rights for All.” The AFL worked closely with the Alberta Human Rights Association in its efforts to persuade Alberta provincial governments, which were reluctant to interfere with the rights of employers and landlords, that discrimination was intolerable in a democratic society. In 1972, the Alberta legislature passed the Individual Rights Protection Act, which spawned the Human Rights Commission and the right of citizens to have discriminatory practices that they had experienced investigated and reversed.

The AFL’s creation of the Workers of Colour and Aboriginal Workers Committee in the 1990s was a recognition of the fact that discrimination has continued despite the protections in law that are supposed to prevent it. This committee has identified and fought against subtle forms of racialism in which stereotypes of particular racial groups reduce the possibilities of advancement of individuals who are “racialized” as members of that group and not judged on the basis of their individual achievements. The committee has fought for better representation of diverse workers within both the unions and at all levels of various workplaces. It has played a big role in campaigns against employer exploitation of temporary foreign workers, whose employers, as studies suggest, have, in the main, ignored labour legislation in their dealings with these vulnerable workers.

The labour movement in Canada had campaigned for a program of universal medical insurance even before World War I. After World War II it became a key political cause for labour and was enshrined as a chief plank for the New Democratic Party when it formed in 1961 as a coalition of labour political action committees and the old CCF. Tommy Douglas, the NDP’s first national leader, had won the 1960 provincial election in Saskatchewan on a promise to implement a provincial medicare scheme, and his successor, Woodrow Lloyd, followed suit. Douglas had the opportunity to insure that such a national program was implemented when the Liberals, whose nominal commitment to medicare since 1919 had never persuaded any federal Liberal government to fulfill the promise, found themselves in a minority position after the federal election of 1963. A federal medicare program was part of the price that Douglas extracted for NDP support of the Liberal minority government. Labour played the main role in pressuring Prime Minister Lester Pearson not to stall medicare’s implementation. It was labour’s interventions before the Hall Commission, established by John Diefenbaker’s Conservatives, to study the funding of medical care in Canada, that led to the Hall Report of 1964 that firmly supported a national, universal program. But the Liberals failed to include dental care, pharmacare, and homecare, which the labour movement continues to advocate for to this day.

At the height of the Cold War, Charles Millard, director of regional organization for the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions from 1956 to 1961, and former Canadian director of the United Steelworkers of America, attempted unsuccessfully to challenge the AFL-CIO’s Cold War mentality regarding Latin America. The AFL-CIO worked with American intelligence to subvert independent Latin American trade unions, claiming that they were fronts for international communism.

The Canadian trade union movement gradually separated itself from their American counterparts’ bipolar view of the world and asserted the right of workers everywhere to organized trade unions free of control by the state in their own country or by the United States. The Canadian Labour Congress denounced the military overthrow of Salvador Allende’s elected left-wing coalition government in 1973 and the banning of the country’s trade unions, a coup that was soon followed by military takeovers across that continent and the murder of trade union leaders.

By the early 2000s, with the Cold War over, trade union leaders in Canada became bolder in denouncing American efforts to overthrow progressive elected regimes in Latin America and state efforts to intimidate trade unionists on the continent. In 2005, the Alberta Federation of Labour and the Edmonton and District Labour Council endorsed Hands off Venezuela (HOV), a social movement formed to oppose American efforts to topple the elected government of President Hugo Chávez, which had dramatically reduced poverty and inequalities in Venezuela. Edmonton Ironworkers 720 made a significant donation to HOV.

In 1936, Spanish voters elected a centre-left coalition government, led by the Socialist Party and supported by the Communist Party. The country’s aristocracy and bourgeoisie, only willing to support democracy when it produced a government that did not threaten their financial interests, supported a military coup led by Generalissimo Francisco Franco. The Republican government rallied its supporters in Spain to resist the fascists led by Franco and in 1937 also called on democrats abroad to come to Spain to fight to preserve democracy in the country. About 1500 Canadians responded to that call for support. About 80 percent of the volunteers who joined the Mackenzie-Papineau Battalion had been part of the army of the unemployed who marched from B.C. labour camps on to Ottawa, adding supporters along the way, only to see their movement brutally suppressed by the RCMP in Regina on July 1, 1935. About half of the Mackenzie-Papineau members died at the hands of the Spanish fascists.

Franco and his fascists were armed by Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini. But Spain’s pleas to democratic nations to respond with military support for the republic were ignored because the leaders of Britain regarded Hitler as a potential conqueror of the Soviet Union, whose communist policies were a nightmare for vested interests. Canada forbade its citizens to participate in the Spanish War and punished veterans when they returned to Canada.

A latecomer to support of the women’s liberation movement that emerged in the 1960s, the Alberta trade union movement gradually became a leading advocate. The United Garment Workers organized Edmonton’s GWG plant in 1911, but further organization of women workers came slowly. In the 1960s, as the numbers of unionized public employees grew rapidly along with women’s employment in those jobs, women began their march to becoming a majority of union members.

As women gradually entered the ranks of leadership in unions, they insured that working women’s issues took on increasing importance in negotiations, grievances, and day-to-day union work. Trade unions led the way in winning maternity leave rights for women employees. Such rights were later extended to other women by governments. In 1992, thanks to pressure from Susan Parcels, an Alberta nurse, who had the backing of the United Nurses of Alberta, the courts ruled that women are eligible for sick leave benefits during the health-related portion of their maternity leave.

Women’s trade unionism, particularly three strikes by UNA from 1979 to 1988, has changed the status of nursing from near-charitable work rewarded with low pay and no say in working conditions, to a profession characterized by professional pay and at least some union say in the organization of nursing work.

Thanks to the work of union women, the labour movement has campaigned for publicly subsidized daycare, for workplaces free of sexual harassment, and for equal opportunities for promotion for women.

Uniting in the Struggle:
Labour and Social Movements

2014 Alberta Labour History Institute Conference

Join us from June 18 - 21

The labour movement has a long history of working alongside a wide variety of other social and political movements: from the anti-fascist popular front to the Latin American solidarity campaigns of the 1970s and 1980s, from the women’s movement to LGBTQ movement today, from anti-nukes to environmental movements, from human rights campaigns in the 1940s and 1950s to Idle No More today. The Alberta Labour History Institute (ALHI) conference of 18-21 June, 2014, wants to investigate this past, present and future of labour’s interaction with other social movements in Canada and beyond.
